Rosen Supports Virtual Visitation Statute in North Carolina

Raleigh, NC- North Carolina's largest divorce firm, Rosen Law Firm, says creating a virtual visitation statute in North Carolina would provide another option to families struggling to resolve custody disputes.

“People here don’t really think about it, but if we had a statute on virtual visitation they would be more inclined,” says Rosen, president of Rosen law Firm and a Board Certified Family Law Specialist. “Statutes are not only created to make people act a certain way, but to help educate them on their options.

Currently in North Carolina, virtual visitations are sometimes agreed to in child custody hearings, but usually between the parties, not as a court order. “Making this legislation would grant more authority to the judges and sometimes it’s not clear what they can do,” says Rosen.

Last year, Rosen Law Firm held an on-line technology forum which presented and discussed different ways for parents to maintain closer ties with their children through different technology: digital photos, e-cards, email list serves, instant messaging services, on-line games, video mail, Voice over IP, whiteboard, wish lists, scanning, moblogging, and training logs.

“The virtual parent is a new concept, and if it’s the only option for some families, we should take the necessary steps to help foster and strengthen communication between parents and their children,” Rosen says.
